DROUTH IS SERIOUS

Railroads Prepare for Long Siege of Dry Weather.

Louisville, Ky., July 10.—The acute situation developing as a result of the drouth was emphasized when the Louisville & Nashville railroad landed water from Louisville to Shelbyville, where the supply has run low. Less rain comes within a week water trains will have to be sent all along the line. The L. & N. trains in Kentucky use about 5,000,000 gallons of water a day. While the railroad officials are hoping for rain they are also preparing against any emergency that may arise. Arrangements are being made to set aside an extra supply of water so the system can stand months of drouth and, if necessary, furnish water to towns where the supply has been depleted. The water will be obtained from the Kentucky and Ohio rivers and from the Ohio River.

The ordinary freight engine with 7,000 gallons tank can go but about 100 miles without replenishing the supply.

The Hollow of Her Hand

THE HARD-HEADED MAN

By DON MARK LEMON.

(Copyright.)

The water in this here well is as hard as rocks, but that ain't to be wondered at, seeing as how the well was dug by the hardest-headed man in all creation and Hampshire county.

About ten years ago, and for about twenty years before that, old Jim Clark and his son Bill lived here. They were two of a kind, and that kind was rocks. They were hard-headed from the socks up. They had such hard-headed notions about most things that people around here just concluded that they were born "set," and so let 'em alone.

One day old man Clark thought he'd like to have his well over nearer the barn, and it was a blessed thing he decided to dig a new hole instead of moving the old one, or he'd have done it. He says to Bill: "Bill, I'm going over to Berkshire to look after some cows, and while I'm gone you hustle a bit and get the well started."

"Where'll I begin the top of it?" asks Bill, kind of sarcastic like, as the old well his dad had dug slanted a good bit going down.

"Right here," says old man Clark, pointing at this particular spot.

A hard-headed look came into Bill's face. "This ain't no place for the well," he says, and he walks round to the other end of the barn and starts the well where he thinks it ought to be.

"What are you doing there?" calls old man Clark.

"Digging a well," says Bill.

"Who told you to dig it over there?" shouts the old man.

"Common sense," says Bill.

Then a hard-headed look came into old man Clark's face. "You dig the well where I tell you to," he says, "or I'll minko you."

"Shoo, dad!" says Bill, who was a great, strapping fellow of twenty.

"You think I can't?" says old man Clark.

"I do," says Bill.

"You'll dig the well here," says the old man, and about a month later he fills up the new well that Bill dug in the wrong spot, and goes off with the remark that he'll be back in about five or ten years.

Bill watches him go over the hill, and then he goes back and digs out the well that his dad had filled up.

Well, about six years after that, old man Clark comes home from only the Lord knows where.

"Hello, dad!" says old man Clark.

"Hello, Bill!" says old man Clark. Then he sees that the well hasn't been dug where he wants it, and he says: "Are you going to dig that well where I told you to?"

"No," says Bill, "I ain't."

"You'll dig that well where I want you to," says old man Clark, and he goes into the house and says not another word about it for ten years, when, as he was dying, he calls Bill in and asks:

"Have you changed your mind about digging that well?"

"No, dad," says Bill, "I ain't."

"You'll dig that well where I told you to," says the dying man, and then he turns over and dies.

But first he gives Bill a letter, and after the funeral Bill opens it and reads that, since he wouldn't dig the well where his dad wanted him to, old man Clark had drawn out the ten thousand dollars that used to be in the bank, and he would now have to hunt around and find where it was hidden, according to directions.

The first direction was to dig under a big stone in the pasture, which Bill did, and found a piece of paper in a lead box telling him to go to a place in South America, up in the Andes, and dig in a certain spot near a river, and he would find further directions.

Bill left the farm in the care of a neighbor, and after months of travel and adventure and danger of all kinds he reached the Andes and dug where he had been told to, and unearthed another little lead box. Inside it was a strip of paper, which told him to go to Alaska and dig at a certain place near Dawson City and he would learn more.

Bill tucked the directions away very carefully, and when he reached Alaska, he found the spot mentioned by old man Clark and dug for further information.

He unearthed another of those little lead boxes, and inside, in the handwriting of his dad, was the cheerful information that, since he had been so hard-headed about digging that well, he would now need to go to Africa and dig in a certain spot—which he found on the map was about the middle of that country—and he'd find where the ten thousand dollars were buried.

Well, Bill tucked this information away careful like, and about three years later he found the box, and inside was a slip of paper telling him that if he would go home to New England and dig the well where he had been told to dig it, he would unearth a box containing ten thousand dollars in hundred-dollar notes.

It took him seven years to reach New England, but finally he got back home, and after going out to see the old man's grave, he got a shovel and started to dig the well where his dad had told him to dig it. After a spell he came on the box and ten thousand dollars.

So, you see, he dug the well after all, and he's not the only man in creation that has chased over the earth, to come home in the end and dig a well.

Courts on Felons.

A felon caused by an accidental bruise upon the finger of the holder of an accident insurance policy is held in the Vermont case of Robinson vs. Masonic Protective Assn. 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 924, to be within the clause of the policy providing compensation for accidental injury resulting from some violent, external and involuntary cause leaving external and visible marks of a wound. This appears to be a pioneer case upon the question.

CHAPTER XVII.—Continued.

He did not once interrupt her. All the time she was speaking he was studying the profile of her face as if fascinated by its strange immobility. For the matter of a full half-hour he sat on the rail, his back against a post, his arms folded across the breast of the thick ulster he wore, staring at her, drinking in every word of the story she told. A look of surprise crept into his face when she came to the point where she thought of marrying Hetty to the brother of her victim first began to manifest itself in her designs. For a time the look of incredulity remained, to be succeeded by utter scorn as she went on with the recital. Her reasons, her excuses, her explanations for this master stroke in the way of compensation for all that she had endured at the hands of the scornful Wrاندalls, all of whom were hateful to her without exception, stirred him deeply. He began to understand the forces that compelled her to resort to this Machiavellian plan for revenge on them. She admitted everything: her readiness to light Hetty's life forever; her utter callousness in laying down these ugly plans; her surpassing vindictiveness; her reactions on the triumph she was to enjoy when her aims were fully attained. She confessed to a genuine pity for Hetty Castleton from the beginning, but it was outweighed by that thing she could only describe as an obsession. . . . How she hated the Wrاندalls! . . . Then came the real awakening: when the truth came to her as a revelation from God. Hetty had not been to blame. The girl was innocent of the one sin that called for vengeance so far as she was concerned. The slaying of Challis Wrاندall was justified! All these months she had been harboring a woman she believed to have been his mistress as well as his murderer. It was not so much the murderer that she would have tolerated upon the Wrاندalls as a daughter, but the mistress! She loved the girl, she had loved her from that first night. Back of it all, therefore, lay the sterner, unsuspected truth: from the very beginning she instinctively had known this girl to be innocent of guilt. . . . Her house of cards fell down. There was nothing left of the plans on which it had been constructed. It had all been swept away, even as she strove to protect it against destruction, and the ground was strewn with the ashes of fires burnt out. . . . She was shocked to find that she had even built upon the evil spot! . . . Almost word for word she repeated Hetty's own story of her meeting with Challis Wrاندall, and how she went, step by step and blindly, to the last scene in the tragedy, when his villainous, his true nature was revealed to her. The girl had told her everything. She had thought herself to be in love with Wrاندall. She was carried away by his protestations. She was infatuated. (Sara smiled to herself as she spoke of this. She knew Challis Wrاندall's charm.) The girl believed in him implicitly. When he took her to the inn it was to make her his as she supposed. He had arrested everything. Then came the . . . She defended herself. . . . came upon her in the road on wild night, Brando, at the place pointed out. Can you picture her as have described her? Can you picture her despair, her hopelessness, her misery? I have told you everything, from beginning to end. You know how she came to me, how I prepared her for the sacrifice, how she left me. I have not written to her. I cannot. She must hate me with all her soul, just as I have hated the Wrاندalls, but with water reason, I confess. She would have even herself up to the law long as it had not been for exposing . . . me to the world as her defender, her protector. She knew she was not morally guilty of the crime of murder. In the beginning she was afraid. She did not know our laws. In time she came to understand that she was in no real peril, but then it was too late. A confession would have placed me in an impossible position. You see, she thought of me all this time. She loved me as no woman ever loved another. Was not I the wife of the man who had killed, and was not I the noblest of all women in her eyes? God! And to think of what I had planned for her!

"This was the end of the story.

The words died away in a sort of whispering fall, falling in with the wind he loathed to his straining ears. Her head drooped, her arms hung limply at her side.

For a long time he sat there in silence, looking out over the darkening water, unwilling, unable, lured, to speak. His heart was full of compassion for her, mingling strangely with what was left of scorn and horror. What could he say to her?

At last she turned to him. "Now you know all that I can tell you of Hetty Castleton—of Hetty Glynn. You could not have forced this from me, Brando. She would not tell you. It was left for me to do in my own good time. Well, I have spoken. What have you to say?"

"I can only say, Sara, that I thank God for everything," he said slowly. "For everything?"

"I thank God for you, for her and for everything. I thank God that she and I have met, that she has killed me, that you should have her, that you tried to carry out your devilish scheme, and that your heart is very true today."

"You do not despise me?"

"No, I am sorry for you."

Her eyes narrowed. "I don't want to feel sorry for me."

"You don't understand. I am sorry you because you have found your own and must be despising your own."

"I have guessed the truth. I do."

spise myself. But what could be expected of me?" she asked ironically. "As the Wrاندalls would say, 'blood will tell.'"

"Nonsense! Don't talk like that! It is quite unworthy of you. In spite of everything, Sara, you are wonderful. The very thing you tried to do, the way you went about it, the way you surrendered, makes for greatness in you. If you had gone on with it and succeeded, that fact alone would have put you in the class with the great, strong, virile women of history. It—"

"With the Medicea, the Borgias and—"

"Yes, with them. But they were great women, just the same. You are greater, for you have more than they possessed: a conscience. I wish I could tell you just what I feel. I haven't the words. I—"

"I only want you to tell me the truth. Do you despise me?"

"Again I say that I do not. I can only say that I regard you with—yes, with awe."

"As one might think of a deadly serpent."

"Indrily that," he said, smiling for the first time. He crossed over and laid his hand on her shoulder. "Don't think too meanly of yourself. I understand it all. You lived for months without a heart, that's all."

"You put it very gently."

"I think I am right. Now, you've got it back, and it's hungry for the sweet, good things of life. You want to be happy. You want to love again and to be loved. You don't want to pitted. I understand. It's the return of a heart that went away long months ago and left an empty place that you filled with gall. The bitterness is gone. There is something sweet in its place. Am I not right?"

She hesitated. "If you mean that I want to be loved by my enemies, Brando, you are wrong," she said clearly. "I have not been chastened in that particular."

"You mean the Wrاندalls?"

"It is not in my nature to love my enemies. We stand on the same footing as before, and always shall. They understand me, I understand them. I am glad that my project failed, not for their sake, but for my own."

He was silent. This woman was hounding him. He could not understand a nature like this.

"You say nothing. Well, I can't ask you to understand. We will not discuss my enemies, but my friends. What do you intend to do in respect to Hetty?"

"I am going to make her my wife," he said levelly.

She turned away. It was now quite dark. He could not see the expression on her face.

"What you have heard does not weaken my love for her; it strengthens it."

"No, it strengthens it."

"You know what she has done. She has taken a life with her own hands. Can you take her to your bosom, can you make her the mother of your own children? Remember, there is blood on her hands."

"Ah, but her heart is clean!"

"True," she said moodily, "her heart is clean."

"No cleaner than yours is now, Sara."

She uttered a short, mocking laugh. "It isn't necessary to say a thing like that to me."

"I beg your pardon."

Her manner changed abruptly. She turned to him, intense and serious.

"She is so far away, Brando. On the other side of the world, and she is full of longing for me. How am I to regain what I have lost? How am I to make her understand? She went away with that last ugly thought of me, with the thought of me as I appeared to her on that last, enlightening day. All these months it has been growing more horrible to her. It has been beside her all the time. All these months she has known that I pretended to love her as—"

This Woman Was Beyond Him.

"I don't believe you know Hetty as well as you think you do," he broke in. "You forget that she loved you with all her soul. You can't kill love so easily as all that. It will be all right, Sara. You must write and ask her to come back. It—"

"Ah, but you don't know!" Then she related the story of the liberated canary bird. "Hetty understands. The cage door is open. She may return when she chooses, but—don't you see?—she must come of her own free will."

"You will not ask her to come?"

"No, it is the test. She will know that I have told you everything. You will go to her. Then she may understand. If she forgives she will come back. There is nothing else to say, nothing else to consider."

"I shall go to her at once," he said resolutely.

She gave him a quick, searching glance.

"She may refuse to marry you, even now, Brando."

"She can't!" he cried. An instant later his face fell. "By Jove, I—I suppose the law will have to be considered now. She will at least have to go through the form of a trial."

She whirled on him angrily. "The law? What has the law to do with it? Don't be a fool!"

"She ought to be legally exonerated," he said.

Her fingers gripped his arm fiercely. "I want you to understand one thing, Brando. The story I have told you was for your ears alone. The secret lives with us and dies with us."

He looked his relief. "Right! It must go no farther. It is not a matter for the law to decide. You may trust me."

"I am old," she said. He heard her teeth chatter distinctly as she pulled her thick mantle closer about her throat and shoulders. "It is very raw and wet down here. Come!"

As she started off along the long, narrow pier, he sprang after her, grasping her arm. She leaned rather heavily against him for a few steps and then drew herself up. Her teeth still chattered, her arm trembled in his grasp.

"By Jove, Sara, this is bad," he cried, in distress. "You're chilled to the marrow."

"Nerves," she retorted, and he somehow felt that her lips were not drawn.

"You must get to bed right away. Hot bath, mustard, and all that. I'll not stop for dinner. Thanks just the same. I will be over in the morning."

"When will you call?" she asked, after a moment.

"I can't go for ten days, at least. My mother goes into the hospital next week for an operation, as I've told you. I can't leave until after that's over. Nothing serious, but—well, I can't go away. I shall write to Hetty tonight, and cable her tomorrow. By the way, I—I don't know just who to find her. You see, we were not to write to each other. It was in the bargain. I suppose you didn't know how I can—"

"Yes, I can tell you precisely where she is. She is in Venice, but leaves there for Rome, by the Express."

"Then you have been hearing from her?"

"Not directly. But I will say this much: there has not been a day since she landed in England that I have not received news of her. I have not been out of touch with her, Brando, not even for an hour."

"Good heaven, Sara! You don't mean to say you've had her shadowed by—by detectives?" he exclaimed, aghast.

"Her maid is a very faithful servant," was her ambiguous rejoinder.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Disturbing News.

He walked home swiftly through the early night, his brain seething with tumultuous thoughts. The revelations of the day were staggering; the whole universe seemed to have turned topsy-turvy since that devastating hour at Burton's inn. Somehow he was not able to confine his thoughts to Hetty Castleton alone. She seemed to sink into the background, despite the absorption he had been so ready, so eager to grant her on hearing the story from Sara's lips. Not that his resolve to search her out and claim her in spite of everything was likely to weaken, but that the absorbing figure of Sara Wrاندall stood out most clearly in his reflections.

What an amazing creature she was! He could not drive her out of his thoughts, even when he tried to concentrate them on the one person who was dearest to him of all in all the world, his warm-hearted, adorable Hetty. Strange contrasts suggested themselves to him as he strode along, head bent and shoulders hunched. He could not help contrasting the two women. He loved Hetty; he would always love her, of that he was positive. She was Sara's superior in every respect, infinitely so, he argued. And yet there was something in Sara that could crowd this adored one, this perfect one out of his thoughts for the time being. He found it difficult to concentrate his thoughts on Hetty Castleton.

How white and ill Sara had looked when she said good night to him at the door! The memory of her dark, mysterious eyes haunted him; he could see them in the night about him. They had been full of pain; there were torrents of tears behind them. They had glistened as if hurried by the fires of fever.

Even as he wrote his long, triumphant letter to Hetty Castleton, the picture of Sara Wrاندall onrushed upon his mental vision. He could not drive it out. He thought of her as she had appeared to him early in the spring; through all the varying stages of the growing intimacy; through the interesting days when he vainly tried to translate her matchless beauty by means of wretched pigments; up to this present hour in which she was revealed, and yet not revealed, to him. Her vivid face was always before him, between his eyes and the thin, white paper on which he scribbled so eagerly. Her feverish eyes were looking into his; she was reading what he wrote before it appeared on the surface of the sheet!

His letter to Hetty was a triumph of skill and diplomacy, achieved after many attempts. He found it hard not to say too much and quite as difficult not to say too little. He spent hours over this all-important missive. At last it was finished. He read and re-read it, searching for the slightest flaw: a fatal word or suggestion that might create in her mind the slightest doubt as to his sincerity. She was sure to read this letter a great many times, and always with the view to finding something between the lines: such as pity, resignation, an enforced conception of loyalty, or even faith! He meant that she should find nothing there but love. It was full of tenderness, full of hope, full of promise. He was coming to her with a steadfast, enduring love in his heart, he wanted her now more than ever before.

There was no mention of Challis Wrاندall, and but once was Sara's name used. There was nothing in the letter that could have betrayed their joint secret to the most acute outsider, and yet she would understand that he had wrong everything from Sara's lips. Her secret was his.

He decided that it would not be safe to anticipate the letter by a telegram. It was not likely that any message he could send would have the desired effect. Instead of reassuring her, in all probability it would create fresh alarm.

Sleep did not come to him until after three o'clock. At two he got up and deliberately added a postscript to the letter he had written. It was in the nature of a poignant plea for Sara Wrاندall. Even as he penned these lines, he shuddered at the thought of what she had planned to do to Hetty Castleton. Staring hard at this black window before him, the pen still in his hand, he allowed his thoughts to dwell so intimately on the subject of his well-meant postscript that her shadow came with its burning eyes seemed to take shape in the night beyond. It was a long time before he could get rid of the illusion. Afterwards he tried to conjure up Hetty's face and to drive out the likeness of the other woman, and found that he could not recall a single feature in the face of the girl he loved!

When he reached Southbrook in the morning, he found that nearly all of the doors and windows were boarded up. Wagons were standing in the stable yard, laden with trunks and crates. Servants without livery were scurrying about the halls. There was an air of finality about their movements.

"Yes, sir," said Watson, in reply to his question, "we are in a rush. Mrs. Wrاندall expects to close the house this evening, sir. We all go up this afternoon. I suppose you know, sir, we've taken a new apartment in town."

"No!" exclaimed Booth.

"Yes, sir, we've, sir. They've been decorating it for the past two weeks. Seems like she didn't care for the old one we had. As a matter of fact, I didn't care much for it, either. She's taken one of them expensive ones looking out over the park, sir. You know we used to look out over Madison Avenue, sir, and God knows it wasn't hinderspin! Yes, sir, we go up this afternoon. Mrs. Wrاندall will be down in a second, thank you, sir."

Booth actually was startled by her appearance when she entered the room a few minutes later. She looked positively ill.

"My dear Sara," he cried anxiously, "this is too bad. You are making yourself ill. Come, come, this won't do."

"I shall be all right in a day or two," she said, with a weary little gesture. "I have been nervous. The strain was too great, Brando. This is the reaction you might say."

"Your head is hot, your eyes look feverish. You'd better see your doctor as soon as you get to town. An ounce of prevention, you know."

"Well," she said, with a searching look into his eyes, "have you written to her?"

"Yes. Posted it at seven o'clock this morning."

"I trust you did not go so far as to—well, to volunteer a word in my behalf. You were not to do that, you know."

He looked uncomfortable. "I'm afraid I did take your name in vain," he equivocated. "You are a—wonderful woman, Sara," he went on, moved to the remark by a curious influence that he could not have explained any more than he could have accounted for the sudden gush of emotion that took possession of him. She ignored the tribute. "You will persuade her to come to New York with you?"

"For your sake, Sara, if she won't come for mine."

"She knows the cage is open," was her way of dismissing the subject, many attempts. He found it hard not to say too much and quite as difficult not to say too little. He spent hours over this all-important missive. At last it was finished. He read and re-read it, searching for the slightest flaw: a fatal word or suggestion that might create in her mind the slightest doubt as to his sincerity. Teaching the Children.

In the Woman's Home Companion appears a department called "The Exchange," in which various contributors give household suggestions. A Texas woman tells, as follows, how she has taught her children to pick up their playthings:

"Being a busy homemaker with three healthy babies to watch over, I try to teach them to help themselves. One great problem is to get scattered toys picked up and put away in proper places. I secured a good-sized soap box, which I covered neatly with denim, and to which I fastened four casters. At night this is my 'freight train' and it's a very simple matter to get my men to push the car around and collect scattered freight (toys)."

WESTERN CANADA
FREE

On many farms in Western Canada a yield of 35 bushels per acre has been reported as high as 50 bushels per acre. At high as 100 bushels have been reported in some districts for oats.

J. Keys arrived in the country 3 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 210 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 55 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

KENTUCKY BUSINESS HEN; HOW TO GET HER AND KEEP HER WORKING

More Interest Taken in the Raising of Pure Bred Poultry Than in the Common Stuff or Mongrels—Small Per Cent of Eggs are Fit for Market

It will pay every farmer to raise only pure bred poultry. You will take more interest and pride in them and thereby give them better care; they attract more attention and therefore are in greater demand; they are better layers; their eggs are more uniform in size and color and by having pure bred first-class stock you are more apt to dispose of your excess stock at a premium. You may claim it costs too much to get started, but this is only fencing, as most farmers have scrap iron around their place which if sold would bring enough to buy several settings of good eggs or even a pen of good stock. We have never known of a single instance where a man has made a success of the poultry business to any great degree where he has used common stuff or mongrels. A very small per cent of the eggs from common fowls are fit to sell as first class. Then you do not get the same value for your feed. There is no mongrel or common chicken that will compare with the egg producing breeds.

Having settled the question of pure bred stock or mongrel we have next to consider the breed, then the variety. Surely there are enough of these to satisfy any taste. Breed is a race of fowls the members of which maintain distinct characteristics which they possess in common. For example, the Wyandottes possess in common, same size, shape, style of comb, color of eye, color of skin, but differ in plumage. The color determines the variety.

There are a number of breeds of poultry which we call general purpose breeds and others we call egg breeds. In egg breeds we have those whose one purpose in life is egg producing. Among these the Leghorns, Minorcas and Spanish are most used. While there are other good egg laying breeds, they have not been bred exclusively for laying.

Egg breeds are not adapted to general purpose, their business is to lay eggs and not to hatch and rear a family, nor do they produce as much meat. The business hen is in reality an egg machine and should be thought of as such. If a hen is to produce two hundred eggs in one year, she has to eat and digest a wonderful amount of food. She should go on the roost night after night with her crop packed. Many farmers in attempting to reach a high egg average in their flock make it a practice to feed the crop of the hen after she is on the roost and if it is found flabby every night she is discarded.

This is why pullets, which are determined to become the layers of the flock, should not be reared in small quarters. The feeding of growing pullets kept in cramped quarters must necessarily be complicated if it is to be successful and the pullet reaches maturity with digestion weakened and unable to stand the strain of the work of heavy egg production. If people of the cities and any others who are keeping hens in small quarters would realize the advantage of buying free range pullets instead of trying to raise their laying stock they would realize considerable gain.

All pullets that are to be kept as winter layers should be fully matured by October 1st. They should then be placed in their winter quarters. Experience has proved that a house with a floor space of five feet per hen and an open front, canvas covered with one square foot canvas to each hen, is best. The first few days after moving the feed should be light as a hungry hen will scratch around and explore, thereby becoming acquainted much sooner than a hen that is not hungry. There should always be about eight inches deep of litter in which the hens can scratch. After this there should be an especial effort to supply her with the proper proportion of green and meat food which are so lacking at this season of the year. I do not think the hen should be confined altogether at this season, but in bad weather she should be kept housed and at all times the runs should be limited. Before pinning the birds in their winter house they should each be carefully gone over for lice or scaly legs. Every bird with signs of these must be treated.

No attempt is made to bring about summer conditions so far as warmth is concerned. The cold is valued as an aid to good appetites and heavy feeding, but the aim is to supply them with all the food elements they would get in summer and enough to take care of the cold besides.

With the grain fields covering these hidden riches it is no wonder that a continued range of optimism is to be seen everywhere. Early reports of seedling of all grains being successfully completed all over the country are followed by reports of excellent and strong growth everywhere. During the first week in June most of the wheat had reached a growth of from twelve to twenty inches, with the most even appearance, almost universally, that has been seen for years. Oats appeared equally well, and covered the ground in a way that brought the broadest kind of a grin to overspread the farmer's countenance.

Barley, a favorite with the hog raisers, had taken good root, and was crowding oats for a first place, as to length of shoot. Cultivated fodder grasses are getting great attention, as a consequence of the inclination to go more largely into mixed farming, and the raising of hogs, cattle and horses. The weather is reported fine, just what is needed, and if present favorable conditions continue, the grain crop of Western Canada for 1914 will be the largest average in the history of the country.—Advertiser.

Put floors off the ground. It avoids dampness and allows a loafing place in hot days.

However, after all else has been said and done the ultimate results are with the feeder. A good dry mash should be kept before the fowls at all times. Of course, this should be kept in bays. A good mash is composed of the following:

100 pounds bran
200 pounds middlings or shortings
200 pounds corn meal
300 pounds ground oats
35 pounds powdered charcoal
250 pounds dry beef craps
75 pounds alfalfa meal
50 pounds gluten meal
25 pounds fine table salt
8 pounds fine table salt

It is also well to moisten a portion of this mash with buttermilk and feed all they will clean up greedily, once a day.

Then for grain feed in winter mix 200 pounds cracked corn and 100 pounds wheat and feed one quart to each twenty-five hens twice each day, morning and noon. This should be thrown in the eight inch litter on the floor of the poultry house as this makes the hens exercise. In summer we change this mixture to 100 pounds cracked corn and 20 pounds wheat and in spring and fall feed equal parts cracked corn and wheat. They are fed as much grit, shell and sprouted oats or other green food as they will eat. We generally use about two square inches of sprouted oats per foot.—D. D. Slade, Poultry Department, Kentucky Agricultural Experiment Station.

Hearty Eaters.

All cows that are hearty eaters are not profitable producers, but all profitable producers are usually hearty eaters.

Keep them growing—the pigs and calves and children—that they may be creditable and profitable.

Pure Bred Hogs in the Lot.

The pure bred hog will mature and come into money more quickly than a scrub, and bring more money for the same weight, at that. Don't select a heavy, lazy sow for a breeder. She should be mild in disposition, but possessed of sufficient energy to take exercise.

As a pasture for hogs alfalfa has shown a greater profit than any other crop.

Cultivate the vegetables, fruits, and flowers thoroughly if you would be successful.

WESTERN CANADA'S NATURAL RESOURCES

PETROLEUM, NATURAL GAS, COAL AND FARM LANDS.

The developments that have taken place recently in the oil and gas fields of Western Canada have but added another to the many previous evidences that have been produced, showing the great wealth that has been an unknown asset for so many generations.

The latest reports from the oil fields at Calgary show that there is a production there that would appear to equal the best paying fields on the continent. Experts have been on the ground for some time. It is said that one of the wells is able to produce 2,000 gallons an hour. If this is so there are but about a dozen wells in the world of greater production. During the past week discoveries of surface indications have been made which show that oil exists over a considerable portion of Alberta and Saskatchewan, while in Manitoba there have also been showings. At Battleford, Saskatchewan, a few days ago discoveries were made which led to the filling of leases on twenty thousand acres of land, all having strong surface indications. Companies were formed to carry on immediate work, and in a couple of months, or probably less, the story will be told whether oil exists in paying quantities.

But there are also the coal deposits and the natural gas deposits that are helping to make of Western Canada one of the wealthiest portions of the continent.

With the grain fields covering these hidden riches it is no wonder that a continued range of optimism is to be seen everywhere. Early reports of seedling of all grains being successfully completed all over the country are followed by reports of excellent and strong growth everywhere. During the first week in June most of the wheat had reached a growth of from twelve to twenty inches, with the most even appearance, almost universally, that has been seen for years. Bathing Popular—Baltimore.

Nearly one hundred thousand baths were taken during May at the various indoor and outdoor stations controlled by the public bath commission, according to a report compiled by Robert F. G. Kelly, acting secretary to the commission. It beat the record for May, 1913, by about twenty-five thousand.

Of the baths last month, 10,662 were taken at the three outdoor stations. At the eight indoor stations 87,530 were taken.—Baltimore Sun.

Use Magazine Stories.

An invalid or aged person who enjoys magazine articles sometimes finds the magazines, with their bulk of advertising, hard to handle. If the magazines are taken apart by removing the little wire clips that bind the sections together, the stories or articles can be easily handled separately. And any article specially likely to be enjoyed by a friend at a distance can be sent by mail when separated in this way.

ON EGYPT'S FAMOUS RIVER

Sailing on Its Placid Waters Rowers Weirily Chant as They Tug at Their Oars.

As we sat on deck, beneath the minarets of the mosque, the skies slowly turned from orange to lilac and purple of night, throwing a strange pink light over the city's buildings, Archie Bell writes in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. The minaret trees and date palms became black and great white cranes, seemingly knowing that their wings had an appropriate background, circled over our heads, over the deep azure river and over the many white sailed dahabehs that were floating along in the breezeless night, propelled by rowers who were chanting weirdly as they tugged at the oars.

Dimly, we could see the black draped figures of numberless women approach the river's brink and we knew that the splashes in the water were caused by the dropping of their heavy jugs, which they twirl around till they are filled, after which they raise them laboriously to their heads and then skip up the banks and disappear in the darkness of the night.

The sounds of the city ceased and all was quiet. All but the plaintive lull of a pipe, who must have been somewhere not far off on the bank of the river. It seemed that he was playing the love song of Laila of Herat. It was monotonous and drowsy and invoked sleep. In the morning before dawn I heard the boys pulling the stake near my window. I had fallen asleep to native music and now I was awakened by their song. As we started up the river, the clarion call of the muezzin rang out from the minaret. For good Mohammedans it meant that a new day had begun—but for infidel Americans, there were several additional hours of sleep.

This will enable aviators to receive messages as well as send them. To the present time the wireless instrument used on aeroplanes have been only to transmit, and the inability to receive messages has kept the operators tied to their base of instructions.

There recently went into a fashionable shoe shop the daughter of a man whose wealth has been acquired within very recent years. The labor union camel having with the assistance of President Wilson thrust his nose under the tent is now preparing to follow with his head, neck and body.—Boston Transcript.

Consul Franklin D. Hale, in an article in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports on the effects of tariff changes on the exports from Huddersfield to the United States, says: "During last year many entertained optimistic views as to the effect of the changes in the American tariff touching the textile goods produced here in great quantities, and many manufacturers made special preparation for such results by increasing their facilities to fill orders, establishing agencies in the United States, etc. By the close of December there was evidence that a larger volume of business would be enjoyed with the United States. The American purchases more than doubled in amount in a few weeks' time." The exportations during the month of January, 1914, approximated one-third of the total exportation for the whole of 1913.

The Michigan Manufacturer thus comments on the provisions in the anti-trust bill exempting labor organizations and farmers' societies from prosecution as violators of the law and legalizing strikes, boycotts and picketing, limiting the power of injunction against such disturbances, and providing for trial by jury of contempt of court cases: "The irony of the Clayton bill is that it sets up one standard for the merchant and the manufacturer and another for the worker and the farmer. So long as two standards prevail about any single matter of conduct in this country there will be discontent and dissension on the part of the class that enjoys the least advantage. That such a measure should finally be approved by the court of last resort seems almost incredible, but much harm may come from the operation of the law before it is finally adjudicated by the supreme court."

PROGRESS IN THE KITCHEN.

The fact that a thing has always been done in a certain way—the mere precedent—limits originality and hampers progress. For example: In a recent issue of the Survey the question why kitchen sinks have been made so low was discussed. No one seemed able to explain. Finally a certain maker discovered that the original sinks were made when the washing of dishes and other sink-work was done in wooden tubs with high sides. Such a tub when used in a high sink came up too far, so the sink was made low. Furthermore, as running water and fixed faucets had not long been made, the tub had to be lifted out of the sink, and the lowered sink the lighter the life. Though improvements in faucets, dish-pans and other accessories of kitchen sinks have been made, no one has med to realize that the sink could be improved raising. So women were—and are—compelled to endure discomfort when doing their ordinary household work. There may be a certain percentage of inconvenience to be reached before the human mind grasps the fact that something must be altered. The wise inventor says The Journal of the American Medical Association, attains a reputation for brilliancy by making his invention before the need becomes obvious to others.

Vice-President Marshall, who is ardently in favor of "wiping the tariff off the slate," and of opening our markets free to the products of China, Japan, India, etc. naturally finds everything right in the time when slavery ruled in this country. Speaking at Orono, Me., recently, he said: "In 1850 we had a republic where labor was satisfied." That was in the "glorious days of slavery," and of the Walker tariff law. The discovery of gold in California, the war in Europe, and our shipping built up under protective laws, helped things then, but to say that "labor was satisfied" with slavery sounds much like an intolerance inspired by the "South in the saddle."

FOOLISH PHILOSOPHY.

A good book is an excellent mind tonic. Beauty is nature's temporary gift to the fair sex. It may be to a man's credit to forget a lot that he knows. Abuse is doubly painful when it's point is barbed with wit. The more dignified a man is when sober the bigger fool when full. The worst thing about the sea of matrimony is the fool who rocks the boat. All things may come to those who wait, but most of us are mighty poor waiters. The summer girl isn't necessarily naughty just because she is always getting tanned. When the woman with a past gets most of the present, we realize that virtue is its own reward. Our idea of a model husband is one who doesn't blame his family for the hot weather. When a girl's shoes hurt her she doesn't say they are too small; she says they don't fit. Sometimes the galled jade wineth even when it has horse sense. The old-fashioned "mushmelon" lacked some of the elegance of the modern cantaloupe, but there was more to it.

THE DAILY NOVELETTE.

The Last Lesson.

"She lived from off the vessel's deck,
And nearly broke her swan-like neck."
—Schoppenheck.

"Aw, go on!" she pleaded, "Teach me how to swim and I promise to do exactly as you say."

So, knowing that she had never been known to break a promise, he took her down to Dinglefoot Lake, and, after they had dined (see footnote) their bathing suits, he said, "Now, the first thing I want you to do is quite simple. I merely want you to let me pick you up and throw you bodily into deep water, and then jump in and pull you out. That will give you confidence."

So (for she had promised) she allowed him to throw her into thirty feet of water. She made quite a splash for a little girl, and by the time he had removed the splinter from his foot and jumped in after her she was coming up for the eleventh and last time.

"I certainly admire your spirit," he told her enthusiastically after he had revived her on a barrel (in his boyhood he had been a Boy Scout.) "You're learn, I'm sure. Now this time I want you to strike out boldly when I throw you over. That will give you even more confidence."

So (for she wouldn't break a promise for anything) she let him throw her over again, and this time she struck boldly out until she hit bottom. He had quite a job finding her, for the bottom was of mud. In all, he threw her over four more times, and she did not protest, for she had promised.

But that evening, as soon as she was able to talk, she broke off the engagement.

MITCHELLISMS--BOMB-SHELLS IN NUT-SHELLS
From "JOB, OR THE WORLD'S ASH HEAP."
Dr. C. C. Mitchell's Lecture.
(In Two Reels)

The hand that rocks the cradle isn't much talked about.

If a woman could only wield a sword instead of a broom.

Woman is one of the silent forces of the cosmos.

Man makes his contribution of law, logic and dynamite; and these are about all he has in his tool chest.

But that patience which disease can not wear out, that hope which the rust of sorrow cannot eat out, that love which brittleness cannot beat out. God only had enough for one and He gave it to mother.

Mrs. Job was good but not great. Had she been able to go all the way the world would never have listened to Job's invective on life.

Man can play his part, if the heart tendril of some pure girl, wife or mother back in the shadow, hold, but let them break then man goes down crying "My God why hast thou forsaken me."

ACT III--SCENE I.
Enter Job's Friends.
"A friend is the first one that comes in after all the world has gone out."
If you want to get rid of a lot of sneezers who feed upon you, just go into bankruptcy.

Job had a multitude of friends in the days of his fame and plenty, but there were only three left, when passed through the "separator" tribulation. Eliphaz, the oldest, at least the profoundest, dreamed dreams, held intercourse with unseen worlds, although he was not a spiritualist, etc.

Bilddad, a smaller man, also had a narrower vision of life. He viewed life not from the mountain top but from the knot hole in the fence.

He was orthodox, as is a parrot; measured truth by the moss it had on it, and when he wanted to go forward, like a crow, he always went backwards. It had a profound respect for the fathers—truth died with them.

Zophar, the largest, also the weakest. He didn't think twice in the same place. He didn't see things in vision out line only when he had eaten too much supper. He was only an echo—a Baltimore lurch.

These three are on their way to see Job. No way of telling what they were by profession, bankers, sheep speculators or stockholders in the camel trust. These three had heard of the son-in-law of the Job farm.

They were prepared to look into the face of their old time friend filled with sorrow. They were prepared to pat him on the back and say "cheer up old boy you will win this all back again."

But instead of Job coming to greet them, on nearer approach they see a mass of human corruption seated on an ash heap. It was Job.

This is the psychological moment, the moment when the heart ache comes into the story.

A terrible suspicion seizes these three. They stop, are dumfounded, paralyzed. They stoop, toss dust in the air toward heaven, sit down around that ash heap and for seven days say not a word.

Silence is golden—this meant many things. It meant the harrowing into their con-

SCHOOL CONSOLIDATION AND ITS ADVANTAGES

(Paper written and read by Miss Ora Lee Elliott, secretary, at the meeting of "The Neighborhood Club," at Springfield, July 1.)

In the present day and age we find many different factors at work for the betterment of the rural schools.

Of these none is more vital and important than the movement toward consolidation.

What do we mean by consolidation? A consolidated school is two or more district schools combined in one large graded school conveniently located and to which pupils from the outlying districts are transferred, usually at public expense.

We find today many changes necessitating consolidation. A generation or two ago it was common for the rural school to enroll thirty, forty or even fifty pupils. But that day is past. So social and industrial changes have come about and towns and cities are claiming an increasingly larger proportion of our people. Many who still live on the farms now send their children to the town school instead of to the little home school.

As a result, thousands of rural schools are today running with less than ten pupils.

This loss in number has produced serious consequences in the rural school and our people are coming to see that the interest, the efficiency and the economy formerly belonging to the larger district schools are wanting in the small schools of the present day, therefore readjustments must be made to meet the changed conditions in education.

Consolidation has many advantages and is the only way of securing really good country schools and the only solution of the problem of agricultural education.

One of the first and most obvious advantages of consolidation is that it supplies the necessary conditions for a graded school. The district school can never be graded accurately where there is but one teacher for all eight grades.

Nor with the great variety of subjects now demanded in the curriculum can any teacher be well prepared to teach them all. No rural teacher should be expected to teach more than two, or at the most, three grades. We find that difference in the age of the pupils demands different methods of instruction and leadership and the teacher relieved of the necessity of covering the whole range of elementary subjects can now specialize on one or two grades of the work and develop a high degree of efficiency.

The consolidated school also has an important bearing upon the size of the classes. You will agree that it is easier and more stimulating to teach a comparatively large class than a very small one. In the average district school it is no uncommon thing to find class after class numbering three, two or even one pupil. Now, it requires practically as much time and effort on the part of a teacher to make preparation for a class numbering one or two pupils as for a class of twelve or fifteen. And it is far less difficult to create and maintain interest in a larger class than in a very small one. By gathering all the pupils from five, six or more old district schools into a consolidated school, each class is sure to be sufficiently large to stimulate both teacher and pupil.

But more important still is the amount of time allotted to each class. The average number of recitations per day in district schools is almost double the average number in graded schools. This means that the teacher in a graded school can give twice as much time to each recitation as the teacher in the district school.

Again consolidation allows an extension of the rural-school curriculum. Today the public is asking for a course of study that shall not only include the old fundamentals, but also the practical newer branches relating to the immediate life and work of the pupil. This can never be accomplished successfully in the district school with its many grades under one already overworked teacher. It requires the consolidated school with its division into grades, and some opportunity for specialization on the part of the teachers.

Again the consolidated school is the chief agent for securing new and necessary buildings and equipment. The country child has much need for modern era improvements as a part of their school facilities as the city child. The more practical and helpful subjects recently added to the curriculum can not be taught effectively within the walls of the country school house. These branches of study require not only additional room but special equipment. Where in the ordinary district school is there room for a laboratory, a workshop, a domestic science department, or a kitchen?

But perhaps of even more importance than these is the matter of sanitation and the health of the body. With rare exceptions district schools have very limited and undesirable accommodations in the seating, the lighting and the ventilation equipments which they possess. Consolidated schools are being built that are beyond criticism on these points.

Consolidation has also proved desirable because it has secured better teachers and closer supervision. In these days when there are so few effective inducements to lead promising young people into teaching and when city schools are the goal of almost every aspiring teacher, it is next to impossible to find competent teachers for the one room country schools.

By closer supervision we mean the presence and services of the superintendent or principal, who is at the head of every consolidated school. The very fact that the daily work of a teacher falls under the scrutiny of an experienced leader is enough to call forth maximum effort. Consolidation has proved its superiority over any other type of rural schools by keeping a larger percentage of the older children in school.

Again the consolidated school is a great natural social center. The rural community as it exists at present offers few opportunities for social mingling in general neighborhood groups. The consolidated school is the most natural and effective solution of the rural need for a neighborhood center.

Again greater economy has been urged as an outstanding advantage of consolidation. But educational advantages and social opportunities can not be measured in terms of dollars and cents alone. The strongest claims for the consolidated school are not based on the question of economy. They are based on the belief that our people are ready, and are demanding (1) better accommodations, (2) higher educational efficiency, and (3) an enriched country life.

When the consolidated school fails to excel the district school in these advantages it fails to live up to the real purpose for which it was created.

The Senate passed the Sundry Civil Bill after refusing to amend or eliminate the labor exemption clauses. The measure carries $111,000,000.

A Good Time
At Table
without the usual cup of coffee, and feel a whole lot better between meals, too—free from the old "off color feeling"—bilioousness, indigestion, nervousness and heart flutter.

The secret is
POSTUM
—Instead of coffee.

Try the change for a couple of weeks and observe two noticeable things:
You won't miss the old beverage, for Postum tastes much like rare old Java.
Further, there's the brisk, alert feeling,—free from the logginess of a lazy liver and disturbed digestion.
Thousands of people have made the change and know
"There's a Reason"

Postum comes in two forms:
Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages
Instant Postum—needs no boiling. A teaspoonful of the soluble powder stirred in a cup of hot water makes a delightful beverage instantly. Add cream and sugar to taste. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.
—Grocers everywhere sell POSTUM.

AYBE it is an old fashioned idea this notion of putting all the value possible into the car itself—and as little as possible into overhead expense—

But it has given the Paige a positively dominant position among cars of medium price—

Ample capital for operating purposes—no bonded indebtedness—no excessive capitalization—no heavy overhead of any kind to be paid for.

Just a full dollar of car value for every dollar of the selling price.

Is it any wonder that the Paige is going to be oversold again this year in spite of increased production?

AUTOMOBILE STIR-UP.

The authorities have been getting after the unlicensed autos, the unlicensed chauffeurs and the fellows who oversped in the city limits, and a whole lot of new license tags are now in evidence. Owners of automobiles must observe the law just like other people and when they do they are entitled to protection and when they do not the duty of the court is to inflict the penalty.—Flemingsburg Democrat.

RATS! RATS! RATS!

Bubonic Plague Feared Along The Rivers and Towns are Making War on The Rodents.

It is a matter of serious import to towns and cities along the river. St. Louis, Cincinnati and Pittsburg are determining upon means to rid themselves of rats. Portsmouth, Huntington and several other cities are studying the proposition. It is claimed the plague is in New Orleans and will be carried all up and down the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and their tributaries by the rats on the boats.

In our city the rats are a nuisance and a lady appeared at the last meeting of the city council and asked for relief.

One individual alone cannot accomplish much but the combined efforts of the many will soon cause Mr. Rat to cease to exist.

WORST KENTUCKY DROUTH

On Record for the Time of Year—Blue Grass Section Drying Up.

(Lexington Leader.)

The bluegrass country, as well as the rest of Kentucky, is just now in the throes of one of the severest drouths ever experienced at this season of the year, and unless rain comes soon to relieve the situation the growing crops, particularly corn and tobacco, will be irreparably damaged.

While the rainfall has been far below normal, according to the official report of the local weather bureau, the torrid temperature has greatly aggravated the situation, the blazing sun literally parching the ground and burning up vegetation of all kinds.

Throughout Central Kentucky there has been no rain with the exception of the slight shower which accompanied the severe winter storm that swept over this immediate section on June 25, since June 19, and even then the supply of moisture was below normal. During these three weeks the sun has poured its torrid rays on the landscape, scorching the meadows, parching the crops, drying up the streams and cutting short the supply of fruit and garden truck to an alarming extent.

The early potato and onion crops throughout the State are practically ruined. Gardens in many instances have been abandoned, the drouth having cut short all prospects of return in the way of table vegetables.

While corn and tobacco can stand more heat than most other crops, they are suffering greatly for moisture, and unless rain comes within the next few days there will be a big decrease in the yield.

Proud day—when that first pair of "long pants" is worn! Bring the youngster here—and preserve that "expanded chest" and self-conscious air for him to see a year or two from now.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE—GOES TO THE ASYLUM.

Brooksville, Fla., Augusta Chronicle: On Saturday, June 27th, James A. Griffith attempted to commit suicide by hanging at the home of his sister, Mrs. Eliza Walker, near Chavayville. It will be remembered that Griffith jumped from the Suspension bridge at Cincinnati, several weeks ago, but was pulled from the Ohio before drowning, and at that time he claimed that some uncontrollable impulse caused him to take the leap. On the day he attempted to hang himself two young men discovered him within a short time after he made the leap with the rope around his neck and cut him down, and he was restored to life by hard work on the part of neighbors and physicians. Mr. Griffith was taken to Cincinnati where he was tried on the following Monday on a lunacy charge and ordered committed to the Lexington asylum. His hallucination was that he thought he was going crazy, and that it was the intention to bind him hand and foot and keep him in the asylum twenty years. Mr. Griffith formerly resided in this county, near Bridgeville and we are informed that he had about $3,000 in a local bank.

FLIES FEAR ELECTRIC FANS

About the only thing a fly or mosquito is afraid of is an electric fan.

While it is not known why these little pests fear the whirling blades, it is certain, however, that an Electric Fan will keep flies off the windows and show cases, and from the candy, vegetables and other foodstuff exposed for sale, even though the breeze is not allowed to play over the places or goods to be protected. Merchants find the Electric Fan invaluable for keeping flies out of their stores. If a fan is placed near the main entrance to the store, so that the air current flows toward the doorway, very few flies will enter.

The fly, that deadliest of household pests, likes stagnant air and hot, stuffy rooms. It takes no comfort and lingers not where Electric Fans constantly and vigorously allow clean, pure, cool air to abundantly circulate in every nook and corner.
